It is known that most of the major Maltese archival collections sustained losses of material or at least considerable disruption during the period of the French occupation of the Maltese islands, between 12 June 1798 and 5 September 1800. To a considerable extent, this was the result of a specific policy aimed to destroy and obliterate all memory of the old political and religious regime prevailing in pre-1798 Malta. Losses of archival material, however, also resulted, willingly or otherwise, from action on the part of the Maltese themselves both before but especially during the course of their rebellion against the French administration.¹ The bare facts as to how certain archives survived in a more or less complete form, while others sustained heavy losses indeed, are often more or less familiar to the historian. Much less is known about what has been irretrievably lost or dispersed and, conversely, about the stratagems used to save material from probable if not certain destruction.²

The almost 250-year old archive of the Holy Office in Malta could hardly fail to attract the almost immediate albeit undesired attention of a new regime which was anathema to all that the Inquisition stood for. Understandably, genuine feelings of fear and of hatred towards the Tribunal were also harboured by some of the local population, and this made the archive even more prone to destruction. Similar situations led to the loss of a vast inquisitorial archival patrimony throughout Catholic Europe during the same period: the archive of the Supreme Congregation of the Holy Office itself was not spared and only a fraction of the original material is now traceable in the Congregation's own archive and in others which have managed to acquire some of the Suprema's dispersed material.³ The archive of the Holy Office in Malta has, in comparison, survived to this day in a relatively complete condition, especially when one also considers the fact that many of its present lacunae are the result of losses sustained well before 1798.⁴ Since the archive's transfer from the bishop's palace to the cathedral museum archive and its subsequent organization, cataloguing and opening up for consultation some forty years ago, the archive of the Inquisition of Malta has constituted a major source of national and international importance where Maltese social history and the functioning of the Roman Inquisition in general are concerned.⁵

It has long been known that Ignazio Debono (1765-1819), the last chancellor of the tribunal of the Inquisition in Malta, was instrumental in ensuring the survival of the vast bulk of the inquisitorial archival material during the period 1798 to 1800.⁶ How this was achieved has, to date, remained unclear. It has been generally assumed that it was the chancellor's delaying tactics in handing over the Inquisitorial archive to the French administration that saved it from almost certain destruction, and that Debono managed to retain possession of the archive throughout French rule, following which he handed it over to the diocesan authorities.⁷ Newly-discovered documentation on the matter not only proves otherwise, but highlights the central role played by Bishop Vincenzo Labini (1735-1807).⁸ Indeed, the survival of the archive resulted from the efforts by these two, even if in conflict with each other over the issue, as well as through the sheer turn of events.⁹ Moreover, these fresh sources provide a detailed listing of the contents of the Inquisitorial archive between November 1798 and September 1799.

What follows here is a study of the new sources within the context of what has already been known. The documentation consists of material discovered in the Archive of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and other in the Maltese Inquisitorial archive. The first comprises a series of letters between Bishop Labini and the Congregation of the Holy Office regarding the transfer of the Maltese Inquisitorial archives to Labini's residence, and is dated between September 1800 and February

⁸ For a biography of Bishop Labini, see M. Galea, The Life and Times of Vincenzo Labini, Bishop of Malta, Malta 1980.

⁹ Mifsud, 67 had already briefly referred to the role of both Debono and Labini in rescuing the Inquisitorial archive from probable destruction. Mifsud, however, did not give his sources in this case. Labini’s role was more or less ignored by subsequent historians and Debono gradually was credited with having saved the archive single-handedly.

1801.¹⁰ The second source is a detailed and dated list of the material which Debono passed over to Labini in batches, between 27 November 1798 and 27 September 1799.¹¹

The first letter sent by Bishop Labini to the Congregation of the Holy Office was dated 10 September 1800, just a few days following the capitulation of the French Republican forces blockaded on the island.¹² Labini recounts how, upon the occupation of the Maltese islands by the French, he became seriously concerned as to the fate of the archive pertaining to the suppressed Inquisitorial tribunal, particularly since material from it could, at that point, be easily made public, if not indeed published, in order to expose the Catholic religion and its priesthood to contempt. Labini was especially worried about documentation pertaining to cases of alleged priestly solicitation during confession, particularly those cases of more recent vintage and which would naturally expose members of the clergy who were still alive. Upon discussing the situation with his theologians and with almost all the former consultants of the Maltese Inquisitorial tribunal, the bishop was unanimously advised to have all papers relating to recent cases of solicitation during confession burned and to have the rest of the Inquisitorial archive transferred to the relative safety of his palace, situated in Valletta. While no date is provided as to when these decisions were taken, it is plausible to assume that the advice was given only a few days, or at the most weeks, following the French takeover and prior to any instructions being issued by the new administration regarding the archive. Labini concurred with the advice given and fervently insisted with the last assessor and chancellor of the tribunal, namely Canon Giovanni Battista Gatt and Reverend Ignazio Debono respectively, for the proposed measures to be carried out immediately.¹³

In his letter Labini proceeded to inform the Suprema that, while the destruction of the recent cases of solicitation was indeed carried out, both Gatt and Debono strongly opposed the request for the transfer of the rest of the archive to the episcopal residence. The reference to the wilful destruction of Inquisitorial documents by the local ecclesiastical establishment itself – though suspected – has never before been actually documented. That such destruction took place is further confirmed by the gaps in the surviving archival material. Thus, while for the decades between 1700 and 1769 the surviving cases of alleged solicitation during confession average sixteen cases per decade, for the decades 1770 to 1798 this goes down to just one case. A volume listing persons imprisoned by the Inquisition between 1757 and 1798 lists two priests who were condemned as late as 25 April and 15 May 1798 respectively, although the cases might have had nothing to do with solicitation during confession.¹⁴

¹² Labini's letter was addressed to the Cardinal Secretary of the Congregation of the Holy Office, with a copy sent to the Assessor of the Congregation; cf. Document 1 in Appendix, below.

¹³ According to the transcription of the Debono letter to Carpegna (see fn. 16, below), Gatt had also been appointed Pro-Inquisitor by the last Inquisitor, Mgr Carpegna, prior to the latter leaving the island on 26 May. In a letter to the government of the Roman Republic, dated 26 April 1798, Carpegna also refers to Gatt as Pro-Inquisitor; see A. Bonnici, Storja ta' I-Inkizzjoni ta' Malta, vol. III, Malta 1994, 533.

Also indicative is the number of cases which are presently missing: while for the period 1700-79 the number of missing cases per decade averages seven, that for 1780-98 goes up to seventeen.¹⁵

The strong resistance to Labini's other request is understandable: the Inquisitorial assessor and chancellor were, among other, duty-bound to guard the archive of what, until just a short time before, had been one of the three major authorities on the island and which was often in conflict with the other two. Not only did the archive contain thousands of trials and denunciations of both a religious and civil nature: it moreover comprised centuries of correspondence with the Congregation of the Holy Office and with the Papal Secretariat of State. It also preserved sensitive material on disputes with the local diocesan establishment. Labini's request, even if motivated only by the sudden and alarming political change hitting the island, could therefore hardly be expected to receive prompt acquiescence by the two most senior Inquisitorial officials left on the island. Even in such a dark reality, one in which Pope Pius VI himself was a French prisoner and all the Roman Congregations had been suspended by the French Republican forces occupying Rome, a lingering hope that all might not yet be over and that the Inquisition might one day be re-established on the island, must have added to the two officials' dilemma in their particularly difficult predicament. It is also known that Debono had received a letter from the last Inquisitor of Malta, Mgr Carpegna, dated 28 June 1798. While as yet untraced, this document might very well have contained instructions to Debono, including ones relating to the archive. What is certain is that Debono felt obliged to keep a record of what was going on in the island with the intention of sending it to Carpegna by way of reply. It was only towards the end of September 1800 that Debono was finally in a position to reply to Carpegna's letter by sending him a detailed account of what had taken place.¹⁶

The survival of the Inquisitorial archive started to be seriously compromised when, on 11 July 1798, the French Government Commission discussed a request submitted on behalf of a number of unidentified citizens by the Municipality of the East, which comprised the Cottonera area, asking for the criminal proceedings within the archive to be burned. The Commission took note of the request, without however deciding on the matter.¹⁷ Meanwhile, it seems that, notwithstanding the fact that seals had been put on the entrances to the archive, a doorway had been forced open and archival material was taken out and ended up freely circulating in public.¹⁸ The Inquisitor's palace had, upon the French takeover, been assigned to a French commander. At the entrance, a bodyguard was billeted, while a certain Vincenzo and Michele were employed as a cook and a butler respectively.¹⁹

On 20 July 1798, while the French Government Commission was still considering the request for the burning of the Inquisitorial criminal proceedings, the re-organisation of the judiciary was announced. Article X stated that all documents, acts and other records of proceedings belonging to the suppressed courts, comprising those of the Inquisitor and the Bishop, were to be transferred to a general depository which was to be set up in one of the halls in the palace of the French Government Commission, formerly the Grand Master's palace. An archivist was appointed in the person of the aged Gaetano Bonavita, an ardent French supporter. The other archival material which did not consist of records of court proceedings (such as correspondence and accounts) was, by default, exempt from being deposited in the new institution. Equally crucial was that the new instructions also requested those currently responsible for the archives of the suppressed tribunals to remain at their post, with the responsibility of separating the concluded cases from the current ones.²⁰ In execution of these stipulations, on 26 July the French Government Commission requested Bishop Labini and Giovanni Battista Gatt, the latter in his position as assessor to the suppressed Inquisitorial tribunal, to comply by handing over the specified archival material in their custody.²¹ Thus it seems that between late July and late October 1798, a portion of the Inquisitorial archive must have been transferred from the former Inquisitor's palace to Gatt's residence so that the latter could comply to the government's instructions. It is clear that the Inquisitorial archival material was not transported directly to the newly-established general state archival depository, but to Gatt's residence. This is confirmed by the payment receipt issued to Bonavita for the transport of the archival material, as well as by Labini's letter which stated that papers were to be seen strewn all over Gatt's house, since the latter was in the process of identifying the civil proceedings as these were to be handed over to Bonavita.²² On 25 October 1798, the French Government Commission provisionally suspended the transfer of the archival material due to financial considerations resulting from the outbreak of the Maltese rebellion.²³ Thus the first batch of Inquisitorial material was transported from the former Inquisitor's palace to Gatt's residence between late July and late October 1798.

Both the lack of reference to non-judicial archival material, as well as the retention of the previous archivists allowed room for manoeuvre and some breathing space which could – and was indeed availed of – to avoid having the Inquisition's archive either destroyed or else handed in toto to the anti-clerical French administration. In the latter case it was patently clear that the material not deemed to be of current utility would end up being made publicly accessible, used for the manufacture of cartridges or simply burnt. The fate of the archive of the Order of St John must have made this painfully clear to both Labini and the Inquisitorial officials. The Maltese Gaetano Bruno, responsible for the Order's archive, had, on the previous day, been instructed to deposit archival material which concerned issues relating to property in the newly-established archive, while the rest was to be considered as useless. A quantity of this material ended up destroyed or sold off by weight to third parties.²⁴ When Menard, the Commissary for the Navy, asked the French Government Commission to utilise the large amount of paper and parchment documents found in the Auberge d'Auvergne for the production of cartridges, his request was granted.²⁵

The transport of part of the archive to Assessor Gatt's residence between late July and late October 1798 must have made the material accessible to Ignazio Debono who, in turn, started passing parts of it to the bishop.²⁶ It was indeed at this point that Labini overrode the Maltese Inquisitorial officials' qualms on the matter, and ordered the transport of Inquisitorial archival material from Gatt's residence to his palace. Whether this move was done with the tacit consent of the French authorities or not is not clear; it must certainly have been difficult to conceal the transport of such material to the bishop's palace on so many occasions. Not only did the bishop pay the transport costs, but he also had a specific area within his palace set for the keeping of the archive. The material was kept securely locked up in cupboards, the keys to which were held by the bishop himself.

Between 27 November and 29 December 1798 Debono – on at least sixteen different occasions – delivered to the bishop the Inquisitorial Memorie, the correspondence to and from the Papal Secretariat of State and the various Roman Congregations, notably that of the Holy Office, and criminal proceedings. The latter consisted of proceedings held under Inquisitors Domenico Cubelles (1561-6) to Galeazzo Marescotti (1663-6). Other criminal proceedings of the same Inquisitors were, however, delivered during 1799. The number of proceedings of each respective Inquisitor that were handed over were listed by Debono and this enables a comparison between the material handed over to the bishop during 1798-99 and that which is presently available within the archive.

The transfer of the rest of the archive from the former Inquisitor's palace to Gatt's house was resumed between late June and mid August 1799. Thus, on 28 June 1799 Noblot, the French Commander of the Eastern Municipality which comprised Cottonera, was requested by the French Government Commission to ensure the safety of the Inquisitorial archive which was still housed in the former Inquisitor's palace, where he was residing. Noblot was also informed that Bonavita had been instructed to carry out the transfer of the archive. This is confirmed by the payment of 8 scudi, 5 tarì and 15 grani issued to Bonavita on 14 August for the removal of the archive from the palace to the residence of the former Inquisitorial assessor, Gatt.²⁷

This second transfer in turn made possible the resumption of Debono's own handing over of material to Labini, which took place between 1 August and 27 September 1799 on some ten separate occasions. Criminal proceedings of the later Inquisitors, mostly from Inquisitor Vidoni down to Carpegna, but also including that pertaining to previous ones, were handed over. Other material comprised cases against members of the Order, volumes of correspondence, an account of Mgr Pietro Dusina's visit of 1575 and other matter of a miscellaneous nature.²⁸ Debono's acquiescence to Labini's instructions seems to have remained a reluctant one, since he himself records having sharp exchanges with the bishop over the matter.²⁹

Following the last delivery of material to Labini on 27 September 1799, Debono stated in writing that he had delivered all Inquisitorial documentation to the bishop, with the exception of the voluminous civil proceedings and the papers pertaining to the Reverenda Fabrica di San Pietro which he held in his possession.³⁰ Labini, however, now demanded the handing over of civil proceedings and the Fabrica documentation as well. This time Debono countered Labini's request by stating that such documentation was safe from the French, since he was feigning sickness and would thus not hand it over to the authorities if he was requested to do so. When Labini pressed the matter, Debono countered by stating that his movements were guarded and was thus impossible for him to hand over the material to the bishop.³¹

In its reply to Labini's letter of 10 September 1800, the Congregation of the Holy Office not only approved Labini's conduct on the matter, but also asked the bishop to take care of the financial interests of the Holy Office in Malta. Moreover, the bishop was also to assume jurisdiction over all spiritual matters previously falling under that of the defunct Inquisitorial tribunal. The Congregation described as unjust any action taken by the assessor, chancellor or any other official of the suppressed tribunal with regards to the latter since the diocese had a bishop who could so ably handle such affairs.³²

This comment was written between others dated end of September and 29 October 1799 respectively. The 'Archivio dell'Inquisitore' refers mainly to the Inquisitorial correspondence and memorie.

³² Documents 2 and 3 in Appendix, below.

Labini's attempt at complying with the Congregation's request regarding the financial matters of the defunct tribunal was nipped in the bud by General Henry Pigot who was in control of the islands. Pigot unequivocally informed Labini in writing that while all the rights of the Maltese Church were guaranteed, no Inquisitorial power emanating from Rome, nor any other ecclesiastical authority pertaining to any foreign sovereign could be recognised. Pigot's stance constitutes a very early official statement on the part of the British authorities administering Malta regarding the inadmissability of re-establishing the Roman Inquisition on the island. It is moreover a revealing document that clearly states the British attitude towards the Church in Malta at the start of the British Protectorate and subsequent rule.³³

Notwithstanding the transfer of Inquisitorial archival material to the bishop's residence, some of the material may have ended up in the central archival repository created by the French administration, since only days after the French capitulation, the Maltese Church formally petitioned the new government for its return. The request referred to the return of all the civil proceedings together with other material from the bishop's archive as well as papers from the archive of the Inquisition.³⁴ Possibly Debono was, sometime after December 1799, forced to hand over at least part of the material he retained in his possession, namely the Inquisitorial civil proceedings and the Reverenda Fabrica material. Other manuscript writings pertaining to the Inquisition ended up as part of the National Library of Malta collection. Such manuscript material, however, may have been housed in the Inquisitorial library and was transported with the books when this transfer was carried out.³⁵ The fact that archival material originally pertaining to the Order of St John, notably 72 volumes of documentation pertaining to the spoils of members of the Order between 1549 and 1772, ended up as an addenda to the Inquisitorial archive seems to have resulted inadvertently during the process of returning the material to the ecclesiastical authorities.³⁶

It is known that Debono did retain documentation from the Inquisitorial archive down to 1814. In that year, he donated the material to Bishop Ferdinando Mattei, Labini's successor. In appreciation, the bishop awarded Debono a pension for life. Whether the material passed over to the bishop in 1814 consisted exclusively of the civil proceedings and the Reverenda Fabrica registers, or whether it comprised other

Letter sent by Bishop of Malta Vincenzo Labini to the Cardinal Secretary of the Congregation of the Holy Office, dated 10 September 1800

Eminentissimo e Reverendissimo Signore Signore e Padrone Colendissimo

[f. 1] Fra i guai accaduti in quest'Isola per essere caduta nelle mani dei francesi nel Giugno del 1798, quello fra gli altri mi ha recata non poca inquietudine, ed ha esatta la mia sollecita vigilanza, il vedere cioè da essi occupato il Palazzo che abitava Mons. Inquisitore, dove vi erano gli Archivj ripieni di carte di non poca importanza. Riflettendo che gli inimici di nostra S. Religione li quali in gran numero abbondavano fra di loro, avrebbero potuto fare di esse un uso di molto danno per la medesima col divulgare, e forse anche colle stampe per maligno astioso animo le Cause di sollecitazione ad turpia, e principalmente di persone ancor viventi con manifesto pericolo di gravissimi scandali, di venire esposta a disprezzi il S. Sagramento della Penitenza, e di risse e vendetta delle persone che resterebbero intaccate nell'onore, ho voluto sentire il parer de' nostri Teologi, e principalmente di quasi tutti li Consul- [f. 1v] tori di questa S. Inquisizione su ciò che convenisse di fare in circostanze così pericolose. Questi sono stati di unanimo parere che bisognava far bruciare senza perder tempo le carte appartenenti a sollecitazioni moderne, e di custodire per quanto fosse possibile le altre carte consistenti in molti grossi volume nel Palazzo di mia abitazione, come luogo, che sebbene non totalmente sicuro, riscuoteva nondimeno qualche particolare riguardo. Il loro parer mi sembro molto prudente, e perciò ne raccomandai caldamente l'esecuzione all'Assessore ed al Cancelliere di questo S. Officio. L'abbruciamiento delle accennate carte non incontro molta difficolta, ma non così accade rispettivamente al trasporto de libri al mio Palazzo, perchè si opposero gagliardamente li detti Assessore e Cancelliere, e voglio credere con buona intenzione. Ma considerando io, che il pericolo sempre più cresceva, e che da un momento all'altro potea nascere ne Francesi la prava volonta di esaminare quelle carte, principalmente se fossero stati fomantati [f. 2] com'era da temersi da qualche

Maltese quanto ad essi amico altrettanto nemico del S. Officio e della S. Fede, ed avendo con certezza saputo che già era stata forzata e rotta una porta segreta del detto archivio, onde vedeansi nel pubblico alcuni carte ad esso spettanti, e che finalmente dopo qualche tempo avendo voluto li francesi che si strapasse il medesimo Archivio, erano stato portate le carte nella casa dell'Assessore, dove vedeansi sparse per le stanze sotto il pretesto, che voglio credere sincero, di separare li Processi civili, che doveansi consegnare al pubblico Archivio secondo l'ordine del Governo, sono stato nella necessità di credere essere mio obbligo indispensabile il cambiare condotta, e di passare dalle dolci insinuazioni ai forti e precisi ordini di non più fare opposizione al trasporto delle ridette carte al Palazzo Vescovile, come si esegui a mie spese. Ho fatto ancora a mie spese apparecchiare luogo conveniente con armadi forniti di buone serrature, le di cui chiavi sono da me medesimo custodite con vigilanza. Tutto ciò ho creduto mio indispensabile dovere nelle luttiose circostanze in cui si siamo ritrovati, perchè non ho stimato che eravi in [f. 2v] quest' Isola persona più del Vescovo obbligata ad impedire per quanto gli fosse stato possibile gli scandali, a difendere la Fede dagli oltraggi ed a promuoverne la venerazione e l'ossequio.

Spero intanto, che il mio operato sara approvato da V.E. da cui implore gli ordini opportuni nel nuovo presente nostro stato rispetto alle medesime carte, che sono nelle mie mani alla prima sua disposizione, e rispetto ad ogni altra cosa, in cui si degnerà darmi l'onore di qualche suo ambito commando, col più profondo rispetto passo a baciare il limbo della S. Porpora, ed a raffermarmi

The Cardinal Secretary's reaction to Labini's letter as communicated to the Assessor of the Holy Office, dated 19 November 1800

Casa 19. Nov. 1800

[f. 1] Ritorna il Card. Antonelli a V.S. Illma. la lettera di Mons Vescovo di Malta, alla quale potra rispondersi con lodare, ed approvar pienamente tutto quello, ch'è stato da lui fatto per la conservazione delle carte spettanti al S.O., pregandolo altresì di continuare a ritenerle presso di se sino di nuovo ordine della S. Congregazione. Gli si potrebbe anche ingiungere di prendersi il pensiere, e la cura degl'interessi economici del S.O., dandogli a tal effetto ogni autorità in nome della stessa Congregazione. Non è giusto, che l'Assessore, [f. 1v] il Cancelliere, e altri ministri subalterni prendano ingerenze sugl'interessi temporali del S.O, quando vi è un Vescovo così degno e zelante, come lo è veramente quello di Malta. Sulle materie poi rituali mancando ora l'Inquisizione, compete già al Vescovo, come ordinario, ogni giurisdizione. E qui il cardinale scrivente colla più distinta stima bacia a V.S. Illma. di vero cuore le mani.

P.S. Essendo stata la lettera di Mons. Vescovo diretta al Card. Segretario, farà conveniente, che la risposta gli si faccia a nome suo per sottoscriversi anche da lui.

Ho ricevuto la pregiatissima Lettera di V.S. Illma. e Rma. in data dei 10 del passato Settembre, e mi son fatto un dovere di passare l'altra sua al Sig. Cardinale Antonelli, il quale da pochi giorni è stato dichiarato Segretario della Sagra Congregazione dalla Santità di N.S. Dalla di lui risposta rileverà quali siano i sentimenti della S. Io non posso che ammirare il di Lei zelo, e commendare ls sua attività e risolutezza mostrata particolarmente nella conservazione delle Carte del S. Offizio. Gradisca V.S. Non sarà mai abbastanza commendato lo sperimentato zelo ed attività da V.S. mostrato in tutte le di Lei operazioni indicate nella sua dei 10 del passato Settembre, ma specialmente in quella di avere conserato le Carte interessanti del Sant'Officio. Non può quindi questa S. Congregazione dispensarsi da contestarlene la sua viva riconoscenza, e renderlene i suoi sinceri ringraziamenti, pregandola altresì di continuare a ritenere presso di se le dette carte sino a nuovo Ordine della medesima.

Letter sent by Bishop Labini to the Cardinal Secretary of the Congregation of the Holy Office, dated 14 February 1801

Eminentissimo e Reverendissimo Signore Signore e Padrone Colendissimo

[f. 1] Sono oltremodo sensibile al gradimento che l'E.V. e cotesta Suprema Congregazione del S. Officio si sono compiaciute manifestarmi per quant io mi trovo aver operato nelle passate critiche circostanze, relativamente alle Carte interessanti, che esistevano in questo Palazzo Inquisitoriale: nel che non riconosco di aver fatto altro, che semplicemente adempire le parti del mio dovere. E quindi rispetto della sperimentata parzialissima bontà di V.E. per me gli obbliganti Offici che la preodata Suprema Congregazione si è degnata passarmi colla Sua [f. 1v] pregiatissima del dì 25 Novembre dello scorso anno 1800, la quale non prima del dì 3 del corrente febbrajo mi è stata ricapitata.

Rapporto agl'interessi economici di questo S. Officio, non posso com'ora dare alcuna contezza all'E.V. ed a cotesta Suprema, perchè attendo i necessari lumi, e rischiarimenti da questo Assessore Dr D. Gio. Batta Gatt, e che per motivo dell'attuale di lui infermità, non è ancor in istato di mettermi a giorno delle cose, per poter io prendere quelle misure che giudicherei [f. 2] proprie ed espediti nel fatto. Mi faro peraltro un pensiere particolare di eseguire esattamente la mente dell'E.V., e di codesta Suprema, se l'attuale posizione e sistema del Paese me lo permetteranno.

In attestato del mio doveroso attaccamento alla Santa sede Apostolica, alla Suprema Congregazione d all'E.V. di cui baciando la Sac. Porpora passo colla dovuta venerazione a rassegnarmi
