This is a collection of articles dealing with various aspects of science as it affects the society of today. A number of chapters deal with topics such as science and human values, religion, and the environment. Other chapters deal with recent developments in genetics and medicine which have revolutionised modern diagnostic techniques, and which will no doubt have a marked effect on therapy in the future. The final chapters deal with teaching science at school, and the role of the scientist in society.

Publishing such a book in Maltese creates problems of its own in that the terminology of modern science has no equivalent in Maltese. It is therefore with interest that we see more and more books on abstruse topics, including philosophy, science and medicine being printed in our language. It is an attempt to establish a repertoire in this genre of writing which is so conspicuously absent in Maltese.

The comprehensive index helps to locate the various topics with relative ease.
